Adam Cohen's eyes were red after he crossed the finish line at the Oklahoma City Memorial Marathon.

Hard to tell if it was from sweat or emotion. Maybe a little of both.

He ran the Boston Marathon two weeks ago and had long since finished his race when bombs exploded at the finish line. The Norman resident was planning to run Oklahoma City before the bombing. "But then in light of what happened in Boston," he said, "it really strengthened my resolve." What happened in Boston added another layer of meaning to a race already steeped with significance. As one of the first marathons in the U.S. since the bombings, Oklahoma

City begins budget work with eye toward adding police officers

BY WILLIAM CRUM

Look for Oklahoma City to keep adding officers to the police force.

City council members said enhancing public safety is their primary goal for the 2013-14 budget. Budget deliberations begin Tuesday with a presentation by City Manager James Couch.

"Of course it's a runaway No. 1," said Larry McAtee, who represents southwest Oklahoma City's Ward 3. "Without public safety, all the other items fall down."
